I Martha Dragoo was in a trance (or ecstacy) as the Greek word may be rendered, being in the proper exercise of my senses and judgment and in open day light — I saw heaven opened to my view towards the south — Brethren and sisters in great Multitudes attending from [illegible] house to the grave yard -- praising the Lord with songs - and moaving in perfect order in the step dance - the brethren on the west the sisters on the east a small space between - Jethro & Caleb was singers and sang so loud and heavenly that they was heard distinctly to the extreme of this vast multitude assembly - They was all clothed in white bright and glittering and in the dance appeared to advance and step back the distance of three or four poles - nor were they impeded by houses fences hills or valleys - but like lightning passed though every thing — None of this vast multitude was distinctly recognized by the beholder; save Jethro and Caleb singers

But Jethro was so distinctly ~~heard~~ seen that his dimple on his chin was minutely marked with his black eyes blazing like comets or stars — Also Caleb countenance was bright his teeth white as ivory his black eyebrows meeting over his nose —

The singers sat on the top of the kitchin as she conducted to be distinctly heard and seen by all — During this vision Martha was spoken to by Nancy once or twice to rise to her feet but her reply was that she could not yet - having a desire to gaze upon this wonderful sight a little longer by the saints in their stately steppings — This in substance was taken from her own mouth by M. Houston

John Wallan wrote the most of this Book or from the year 1812 until the close of the volume, Nathan Sharp in John's absence did a little of it. you can see by the different penmanships
